In this course, we shall consider varying photographic processes and procedures after WW2 in Japan. During the 1950s, Japanese photographers started to work in relation to memory and evidence of the great trauma of war. After William Klein’s visit to Japan, new genres of documentation and innovative visual interpretation that relied on the new styles flourishing in Europe and the US, with a special emphasize on reportage work and stylized snapshot photography. During the 1970s and 1980s Japan became a "photography Superpower", central and very important photographers who later also influenced the international photography scene, while in the 1990, the Gendered Turn in Japanese photography took place, and many young female photographers became the leading force of contemporary Japanese photography.
